Brass Instruments A brass instrument (often British English spelling is "brass" but "brass-plated" or "brass-lined") is a musical instrument made of an oblong, circular or near-circular body, usually hollow, with a resonator. The term brass comes from an old practice of "polishing" or "brassing up" instruments using a brass smooth faced tool. Most brass instruments produce sound by striking a reed or other vibrating object against a surface at the other end of the instrument. Brass instruments are made from different materials, mainly brass, copper, bronze, copper alloys, and nickel silver and zinc silver. The musical tuning of a brass instrument depends on its construction. In general, a brass instrument should not be tuned to a note below B. This includes percussion instruments that have resonators, as well as wind instruments such as trumpets and bugles. Brass instruments include trombones, valve trombones, euphoniums, tubas, baritones, tubas,

French horns, cornets, trumpets, and horns. Brass instruments, especially horns, are important in many types of music, including classical, jazz, and ethnic, country, and pop music. Brass instrumentation is also used to provide color in some classical and musical theatre orchestrations. Brass instruments are part of the standard orchestral instrumentations, whether on stage or in a concert hall. The musical instrument classification system devised by E. T. Emmet in 1892 makes the acronym BTRIMP for "brass (tube), reed (pipe) or metal (plate), and pitch (reed) or key (pipe)". Classification of Brass Instruments The primary function of the brass instrument is to produce sound. There are four main categories of brass instruments:

percussion (toms, bells, etc.), wind (low and high pitched horns, trumpets, flugelhorns, trombones, euphoniums, and tubas), brass (both low and high pitched) and hybrid (single reed instruments, such as the clarinet or bassoon). Other minor categories include slide instruments (as in the violin family). The newer terms brass bass, brass quintet, brass quintet trombone and brass quintet brass are used to refer to brass instruments in this category. Wind instruments Wind instruments include: Brass instruments Bassett horns
